

I don't like writing that much, but I do it when I have to for school. I don't mind writing something I want to write, but most of the time, for school, it is about the most boring topic ever, which I don't care about in the slightest. My first memory of trying to write was when I was in 4th grade, and it was a 3-page essay. I forgot what it was about. I learned how to write in school. I started writing in elementary school, but it wasn't until high school that we had to write a lot. Teachers tell me that writing is a valuable skill to have, and if you can't write, you won't be able to get a good career or communicate effectively over email.

To be a good writer, you need to get your point across clearly while keeping the reader engaged. I dislike it when a book has a lot of unnecessary fluff and filler information, rather than getting straight to the point. I also don't like it when writers try to sound formal and fancy by complicating the sentences and adding unnecessary words. I keep that in mind when I am writing things. I only write when I have to, but when I do, I get straight to the point. I sometimes struggle to reach required word counts because I prefer not to add unnecessary words. Unfortunately, for this decision post, I had to do so in order to reach the required word count to get full credit.